CHICAGO

I started my career after college in software consulting, mostly in Java and front-end development. After getting tired of spending too much time in airports, I went to work for Britannica.com and did front-end work on, at the time, their recently launched website along with building editorial drag-and-drop tools in JavaScript. At True Value, I transitioned into .NET and rebuilt their customer-facing site and wholesale ordering system. Chicago started to feel too confining to me and a move out West to Seattle (without a job!) was the cure...

SEATTLE

With my .NET experience I got a contract with Microsoft optimizing database queries and making frontend updates to internal apps. Looking for full-time work in downtown Seattle, I jumped at a job opportunity with Getty Images as a Web Dev Manager in their Creative Services group. I managed a team of developers, acted as a liaison between IT and Creative, and learned quite a bit about agile development, but what really lit me up was collaborating with designers, writers, and other creatives. After some philosophical changes to the company, I was ready to strike out on my own. I also met a girl who had this itch as well. We shaped her business concept remotely, got married, and moved to Boise...

BOISE

The Wicked Hair opened exactly one year from inception. I helped refine the brand, played receptionist, and started freelancing building custom WordPress websites. I caught Drake Cooper's (ad agency) interest and have did project work with them for about 4 years before branching out to other agencies building custom WordPress themes and helping with overall brand strategy for their clients. Using WordPress and AngularJS, I also build a highly customized project management tool for Tommy Bahama corporate. I'm currently building a native iOS social media app for a Boise startup using Swift 5 in Xcode and RESTful APIs.
